The Police Invite Breckons to Investigate Dead Man's Opium Estate.

Detective Kellett, assisted by Apana and others, last night raided the opium den of Cheong Tuck Poi near the corner of Vineyard and Lillha streets, arresting half a dozen Chinese smokers besides the principal and seizing three tins of opium, one of which was contraband, being unstamped, and also gathering a number of little shells of the dope prepared for smokers. Opium on the half-shell, opium in tiny jar and opium in tins constituted a mixed though not a large haul. Kellett headed the police automobile for the residence of United States District Attorney Breekons, knowing that the latter gentleman would be interested in the tin of smuggled opium, that which was unstamped.

Breekons was in his kimono when aroused, but, ever scenting the opium from afar, even as a warhorse sniffs the battle from a long way off, the bright attorney from Wyoming slipped into his slippers, trousers and a sweater and throwing a few boxes of eigarettes into is coat pocket, jammed on his lid and oined the police party in the machine. Arrived at the police station, the private office of Chief of Detectives Mc-Duffie, which is richly furnished in hatchets which have split skulls, reolvers which have shot souls over the border of life and death, knives which have tasted heart's blood, steel cuffs and bracelets which have clasped wicked hands, files which have cut through barriers, and a hundred other criminal curios, a preliminary investigation of the situation was inaugurated. "I'm tired, but its interesting vork," smiled Breckons, as he recined at full length on the divan and lit a THE Cheung Tuck Poi, ancient of days and heavy with years and slyness, ooking like a piece of oblong parch ment upon which had been inscribed the idiosynerasies of six-bits of a century, set like a dummy except when addressed, than he spun a yarn to the effect that he was not responsible for the opium being found on his premises According to his weird tale, there had died a Chinese in the same house who and left him as sort of an executor of the opium, to sell and to account for on account of the dead man's estate. Defendant had not bought the dope, he was merely holding it in trust for the bones which now lie in Nunann. Breekons, naturally, wanted to know where Tuck Poi got the smuggled can, but Poi merely repeated the story of inheriting it in trust from a defunct Kellett put Mr. Cheong Tuck Pui bew in a nice, clean, cool cell, free from
